THE GENTLEMEN'S SOCIETY
AT SPALDING.

The Gentlemen's Society at Spalding.

IN order to form a correct idea of the circumstances under which "The Gentlemen's Society" at Spalding was first established, it will be necessary to mark the progress which had been made, at that period, by the learned men of this country, in the investigation and study of antiquities.

In the earlier part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, a number of persons, who were impressed with the obvious importance of endeavouring to collect and preserve the vast number of Records and other valuable documents which had been scattered abroad by the pillage of the Monasteries, held their meetings, for the mutual communicating of information upon these subjects, at the house of Sir Robert Cotton, under the patronage of Archbishop Parker. In process of time they had it in contemplation to apply to the Queen for a charter; reciting in their petition, in order to show the importance of their design, that King Edward the First, when he was searching for proofs of his title to the crown of Scotland, ordered diligent inquiry to be made in the libraries of the Monasteries; and that Henry the Eighth did the same, when he was desirous to bring evidence against the usurpations of the Pope. This petition was signed by Sir Robert Cotton, Sir John Dodderidge, and Sir James Lee; but whether it was ever presented is a matter of doubt. The Society, however, continued to exist for thirty years, having numbered among its members in that period the names of Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Philip Sidney, Lord Burleigh, Henry Earl of Arundel, the two Herberts, Earls of Pembroke, Sir Henry Savile, Bishop Andrewes, John Stowe, and William Camden. Its dissolution was owing to the suspicious policy of James the First, who is said to have been afraid, at the time of his accession, lest these prying antiquaries should get an insight into the arcana of kingcraft. In 1617, an unsuccessful attempt was made for its revival, through the mediation of the favourite, Buckingham. During the disturbed state of the country, in the civil wars, certain eminent scholars pursued their researches in private, frequently communicating with each other but not holding stated meetings. Among these were Dugdale, Dodsworth, Somner, Spelman, Selden, D'Ewes, Usher, and Ashmole. Ashmole in his diary mentions some kind of mustering which they had, about the time of the Restoration, called the Antiquaries' feast; and after this the learned body seem to have been dormant for nearly half a century.

In the year 1707, we find symptoms of stirring among them. A few gentlemen, with the intention of prosecuting investigations into the ancient history of Great Britain, began to hold weekly meetings at the various Coffee-houses near the Temple. In 1710, we find the names of Browne Willis, the two Gales, Stukeley, Rymer, and Maurice Johnson. A sketch of the different heads under which they proposed to carry on their researches is still extant. In 1717, they formed themselves into a regular Society, electing a president and other officers. Previously to this it seems to have been agreed, that as soon as their funds should prove sufficient to enable them to buy books, Maurice Johnson should be appointed their librarian.

Maurice Johnson, however, was now removed from the congenial society of London; to his native town of Spalding. He had exchanged the company of wits, at Button's Coffee-House;—and of antiquaries, at the Temple Change;—the company of Addison, Gay, and Steele,—of Willis, Stukeley and the Gales,—for the ordinary society of a country town. And so great was his love of learning and science, that he at once entertained the bold design of establishing a Literary Society in the very heart of the fens of Lincoln. It was, as he said very truly, “an endeavour new, and untried before.” The persons to whom he looked for aid were “unaccustomed to such a mode of spending an evening.” He was himself “only just arrived at manhood:”— and “all his advisers and encouragers were at a great distance.” Yet did he resolve well, and manfully persevere. Taking care not to alarm the country gentlemen by any premature mention of antiquities, he endeavoured at first to allure them into the more flowery paths of literature. In 1709, a few of them were brought together every post-day, at the Coffee-house in the Abbey Yard; and after one of the party had read aloud the last-published number of the “Tatler,” they proceeded to talk over the subject among themselves. Thus were “the men of sense and letters,” he says, “drawn insensibly into a sociable way of conversing.” After a while the “Spectators” were read in like manner; and now and then a new poem, by Gay or Parnell, was brought forward, or an essay or letter upon some subject of polite literature. These papers were carefully preserved, and the attention of the gentlemen was turned to the formation of a library. In 1712, so well satisfied were they with the proceedings of the last three years, that it was determined to place their meetings upon a footing of permanence. Proposals were issued for the establishing of “a Society of Gentlemen, for the supporting of mutual benevolence, and their improvement in the liberal sciences and in polite learning." A president was elected, and a short code of laws was issued for the regulation of their meetings : their founder modestly undertaking the subordinate office of secretary, and at once commencing the Minutes of their transactions. The first recorded subject of their examination was the sketch of an ancient monumental stone and inscription, in Peterborough Cathedral. At the next meeting, the secretary communicated two poetical epistles, the one in Latin, from a gentleman at Eton to his friend ; the other in English, upon the departure of the Duke of Marlborough to take the command of the Allied Forces, in Germany. He also read a paper on the "Choice of Colours and Materials for Miniature Painting," after the directions of Albert Durer and others.

Spalding Society in its infancy.

In these Minutes of the first two meetings which have been recorded, we have a fair specimen of the range of subjects into which they pursued their investigations. Under the head of polite literature, besides ephemeral productions such as those above mentioned, sundry pieces by Swift, Prior, Arbuthnot, Eusden, Young, Gay, and Pope, were read as they came out. Several, indeed, of the poems of Gay and Pope were communicated by the authors themselves, with whom Maurice Johnson had become acquainted at Button's Coffee-house during his residence in London. In 1751, we find it on the minutes, that a certain "Elegy in a Country Church-yard" was read, which had just before come out anonymously. Under the head of Arts and Science, we may class the communications which were made, from time to time, upon painting, sculpture, and music; upon anatomy and medicine; upon mathematics and mechanics. The fens around them furnished curious specimens in ornithology; and the fen-men listened with peculiar interest to the description of engines and machines for draining. For their botanical studies, they were supplied with rare plants and flowers from the garden of their secretary, and also from a physic-garden of their own.

Communications by Gay and Pope.

But the favourite and most fruitful subject was that of Antiquities. Among the monastic institutions of the district, proverbially rich and magnificent, a conspicuous place was occupied by the mitred Priory of Spalding. Of this foundation many chartularies and registers were still in existence, some of them in public libraries, and some in the possession of the Secretary himself, to whom they had descended from his great-grandfather, Sir Richard Ogle, who was one of Queen Elizabeth's commissioners for inquiries respecting Abbey lands. From these ancient records he communicated, from time to time, much valuable information relating to the town and priory, amounting at last to a continuous and complete history. And when other subjects failed,—“on a pinch,” as he says, “and to enliven our chat,” he brought out in chronological order his own ample collection of coins, exhibiting them “with some discourse.” By such communications, aided by those which he elicited from Stukeley, Gale, and others at a distance, as well as from the more intelligent members on the spot, he raised the Society to an eminence which has perhaps never been reached by any provincial society whatever, under similar circumstances; and at which it remained for the long period of forty years. "By the favour of Providence," as he piously expresses it, his exertions were crowned with success. He never lost an opportunity of asking for communications and correspondence, backing his request by the authority of Sir Isaac Newton, who had recommended it as the surest way to keep the Society in active operation. He adopted every form of solicitation. To one person he says: "Your letters will more promote science among us fen-men, (who are thought to labour under a very stupid air,) than the missionaries of Rome have promoted religion, truly so called, among the Chinese."

Encouragement given by Sir Isaac Newton.

The interview with Sir Isaac Newton, just alluded to, took place in 1720. Having, at the suggestion of Dr. Jurin, addressed a letter to him, Maurice Johnson was requested to call at Newton's house, in St. Martin's-street, Leicester-square. The reception he met with was extremely courteous. The venerable philosopher kept him in conversation for some time, "highly commending" the Society at Spalding, and giving his consent to become a member of it; although he was now declining almost everything, and did not go even to the Royal Society."

Foreign members of the Society.

In 1733, the Archi-mandrite or Abbot of one of the convents on Mount Athos, who was travelling with his chaplain, probably for the purpose of soliciting contributions for his convent, was present at a meeting of the Society; and in compliance with his own request, written by him in Romaic or modern Greek in the Minutes, he was admitted as an honorary member. In fact, the Society had members in every part of the globe. At one time they receive a present of minerals and fossils from Norway; and at another time a letter is read from one of their members residing at Panama.

They exhibited on all occasions a praiseworthy desire to admit as many as could attend, to a participation in their privileges and advantages. The master of the Grammar School at Spalding was allowed to bring one of his upper boys to each of the meetings: and as the "auditores" were admitted for five years in the Academies of ancient Greece, so were these youths encouraged to listen and to learn. Several of them became afterwards intelligent and useful members of the Society.

We cannot be surprised to find that there were times during the long period of forty-five years, when it was found difficult to carry on the proceedings “with becoming dignity and spirit.” The professional men were “liable to constant interruption” from professional duties; and the young were “allured, and deterred, and drawn away, by parties of pleasure,” and by the more congenial amusements of “dancing, cards, bowls, billiards, and the like.” Besides which, the subject of politics, “upon which every man thinks himself wise,” was carefully excluded by the rules. It must have required, not only considerable energy and perseverance, but also much courtesy and tact, to surmount these obstacles. In short, it was the work of no ordinary mind to plan, and establish, and maintain for the period of nearly half a century, in that isolated district, a Society which “earned the approbation of eminent philosophers, and of persons held in reverence by the whole learned world;” numbering among its members the names of Newton and Bentley, of Pope, Addison, and Gay.

Other societies were formed after its example and model, some of which met with tolerable success; but the rest, "though in cities of greater frequency of men brought up and benefited for letters," proved abortive.

In order to gratify as much as possible the tastes of all the parties concerned, it was agreed that the anniversary meeting of the Society should be celebrated by a dinner; but the Secretary has recorded his complaint, that this dinner proved "an idle and expensive mode of helping the Society, feeding the body rather than the mind." A Concert was also given, "in order that the Society might have an opportunity of entertaining the ladies, and treating them with a glass of wine." He politely acknowledges that this "answered well, and did the Institution credit and service." In 1741, a parody, written by Lord Bacon, upon a Greek epigram of Posidippus on the vanity of human life, which was sometimes sung on grand days in the Middle Temple Hall "to the original music," was sung at this meeting by Dr. Heighington, a musician of some eminence, accompanied by his son.

After discharging the laborious duties of Secretary for thirty years, Mr. Johnson was the President for the remainder of his life. As he advanced in years, it gave satisfaction to the good old man to present to the Society communications from four of his sons, whom he had "taken care to train up to a liking of it from their infancy." His son Maurice, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Duke of Cumberland's Foot Guards, and Aide-de-camp to the Duke, sent, at one time an account of the Battle of Dettingen,—at other times, drawings and descriptions of Roman remains, altars, coins, statues, and monumental inscriptions, which he had met with during the campaign in Germany. John, another son, who was a member of St. John's College, Cambridge, sent down the poetical effusions of the wits of his University. Martin, from on board his Majesty's ship "Experiment," sent accounts of the proceedings of the fleet under Admiral Vernon. And Walter, who resided on the spot, gave his aid to the Society, not only as an active member, but also by discharging the office of Treasurer. In 1753 appears an entry in the Minutes, in the well-known hand-writing of the venerable founder, but less firm and vigorous than in former days, complaining that age will not permit him to perform, in so accurate a manner as he would wish, the task of making an index to the Society's papers and records. He was afflicted with a disorder in the head, which in 1755 put an end to his life. Of those twelve gentlemen who sat, nearly half a century before, to hear the weekly reading of the "Tatler" and the "Spectator," probably Maurice Johnson was the only one who survived to hear the "Rambler," which came out about this time, and was read as the others had been. To say that the Society died when its founder died, would scarcely be correct: but it can excite little surprise to find that it soon sank to the condition of an ordinary country club; tending perhaps, in some degree, to promote "mutual benevolence," but doing very little to improve its members "in the liberal sciences, or in polite literature."

It appears that Mr. Johnson's sons, to whom he chiefly trusted for the future maintenance of the Society, so seldom resided at Ayscough Fee Hall, the family seat there, that they were unable to devote the personal attention and support essential to the preservation of the Institution. As he himself observed in a letter to his friend Gale, "realms and all communities have their periods." Nevertheless, as Gale in return assured him would be the case,—the "Supellex Literaria" of the Society still remains, "a glorious monument of the public spirit and learning of its founder, and the record of a noble attempt, which otherwise would scarcely be credited by posterity."

His successor as Master of the School was Mr. Walter Johnson of Peter-house, Cambridge. The portrait of Dr. Bentley which hangs now in the room of the Society was presented by Mr. Commissary Greaves, who acted as Bentley's counsel in all the complicated law proceedings in which he was involved. The Rev. Richard Southgate, St. John's, Cambridge, Curate of Weston, May 24, 1753.

[This learned and exemplary Divine deserves more than a passing notice. He was the son of a farmer at Alwalton in Huntingdonshire, his mother being the daughter of Robert Wright, a surveyor and engineer of some repute for his success in the projecting of canal navigation—at that time but little practised. Through the assistance of Bishop Thomas he was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself by his application and love of learning. Being disappointed, however, in his hope of obtaining a fellowship, he entered into holy orders in 1752 as Curate of Weston, where he seems to have remained for two years. In 1763

he became sub-curate of St. James's, Westminster, and in 1765 he was appointed by Dr. Gally to the Curacy of St. Giles. In 1790 John Gally Knight, Esq. presented him to the valuable living of Work-sop. He seems to have been a rare instance of the union in one person of the somewhat dissimilar characteristics of a deeply-read virtuoso and a pains-taking parish priest. As a numismatist he was unrivalled; while as a labourer in the cellars and garrets of the most abandoned and wretched of his parishioners, he seems to have been always at his post. He was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and one of the sub-librarians of the British Museum. His valuable collection of books, coins, and natural curiosities, was disposed of by auction after his death, the sale occupying 21 days.

Alexander Stewart, M.D. F.R.S. F.A.S.
July 17, 1740.

William Stukeley, M.D. September 6, 1722.

[This learned and ingenious antiquary, called by his friends not inappropriately "the Arch-Druid of the age," was born at Holbeach; and, as it may be supposed, the opportunities of early acquaintance and the congeniality of their tastes, begat a friendship with the Founder of this Society which continued until death. Maurice Johnson introduced Stukeley to that circle of learned men in London who formed the nucleus of the rising Society of Antiquaries; and Stukeley inscribed to Johnson the first Iter in his Itinerarium Curiosum.]

Edward Taylor, Esq. Inner Temple. Ansty, Coventry, December 24, 1724.

John Taylor, LL.D. F.R.S. F.A.S. Chancellor of the Diocese.

[A distinguished Scholar and Critic ; the editor of Lyfias and Demosthenes.—When Maurice Johnson went up to Cambridge with one of his sons in October, 1740, Dr. Taylor, who resided in the University as Registrar, showed him a copy of the Vulgate, supposed to have been printed in the year 1464, which formed,—inasmuch as no other copy of the same date had ever been discovered,—one of the choicest treasures of the University library. In fact the Earl of Oxford had in vain sent commissions all over Europe to procure one like it. Scarcely, however, had Maurice Johnson cast his eye upon the colophon when he pointed out to Dr. Taylor how certain letters had been ingeniously altered with the knife and pen ; and without hesitation he pronounced the date to be a false one. Dr. Taylor immediately wrote to the Earl of Oxford, apprizing him of this fact, and observing to him that it was no longer a wonder that his commissions had proved unsuccessful. This letter is still extant ; and the story was long afterwards related by the under-librarian of the University to all visitors who inspected the book.]

James Verney, Painter, February 8, 1753.

George Vertue, Painter and Engraver, F.A.S.
March 6, 1728.

[As a token of the friendship that subsisted between them, Vertue dedicated to the Founder of this Society an engraved portrait of his illustrious namesake and kinsman Ben Jonson. He painted also that miniature likeness of the Founder himself which has been engraved for the illustration of this Memoir. Some of the medals by Simons in the series which Vertue engraved and published, were in Maurice Johnson's possession; and we may be pardoned for referring to—as illustrative of the characteristic enthusiasm of the true virtuoso on the one hand, and of the no less characteristic courtesy of Maurice Johnson on the other—a fact which has been elsewhere recorded. In order to gratify his curiosity with a personal inspection of one of these medals, a gentleman in London, entirely unknown to Maurice Johnson, undertook a journey,—in those days, be it remembered, a long and tedious journey,—down to Spalding, and presented himself without an introduction at Ayscough-fee Hall. On his making known the object of his visit, not only was the request granted with extreme politeness, and without a moment's hesitation, but he was pressed to partake of all the hospitalities which it lay in Mr. Johnson's power to offer. And he ever after related with pleasure the circumstances of his kind reception, and courteous entertainment, considering himself most amply repaid for the trouble of his journey by his introduction to "so polite and universal a Scholar."

[The father of the celebrated John Wesley. He was an intimate friend of the Founder, from whom he received much valuable assistance in the legal department of his Dissertations on the Book of Job, as we learn from the following acknowledgment in the preface of that work :—

“ Neque animi ingrati notam effugere potuissem, nisi libentissimè agnoscerem beneficia quam plurima et auxilia proposito nostro allata a viro doctissimo Mauricio Johnson, armigero, et fundatore Societatis Generosorum Spaldingiae, eique per annos xx jam ab epistolis.”

Maurice Johnson also furnished the design for a frontispiece to the work, in which Job is represented as he sat upon his disphos to administer justice in the street. The face and features are those of Wesley himself, who,—as Mr. Johnson has stated in a manuscript note in the copy belonging to the Vestry library,—“ was not unlike Job in his manners and many circumstances.”]

The early meetings from which this Society originated were held at a coffee-house, kept by one Younger, in the Abbey yard. From this place, when the Society had assumed a more stable form, they were removed to the house of Mr. Everard; and from thence to another house which had hitherto been occupied by Mr. Ambler. After this, a room in the remaining part of the ancient Priory was fitted up as a library and Museum. The Society finally established themselves in a house not far from the High Bridge, and a sketch of their room as it still exists, with all its appropriate fittings and furniture, may be seen upon the opposite page.

THE END.

C. WHITTINGHAM, CHISWICK.

After the decease of its eminent founder, MAURICE JOHNSON, in 1755, the Spalding Gentlemen's Society quickly assumed a very different character. The Members continued to meet every week and accounts of the weekly and annual receipts and expenditure were duly kept ; but the minute book ceased to be used ; little or nothing was added to the Library ; the Physic garden given up ; and the Museum went to decay until at length nearly every specimen was cleared out.

Seventy years later DR. MOORE, having been elected President in 1828, resumed the use of the Minute book and a few interesting essays were, at long intervals, entered therein. DR. CAMMACK and CANON MOORE followed in his footsteps, but the Society was evidently all but moribund. No meeting is recorded, nor can any member call to mind any meeting having been held from April 26th, 1875 until 1889.

At that time the Library, Museum and Furniture were in a most filthy state from the accumulation of dust, and it was very rarely that a member ventured into the room to consult a book : studying therein being an act of the most severe penance.

On July 15th, 1889 a meeting of the surviving members was held, and it was decided that an earnest effort should be made to revivify the Society. DR. PERRY was elected President, MR. E. CAMMACK continued to act as Secretary, and a Committee was appointed to consider the rules of the Society and report thereon.

At the next meeting which was held on September 30th following, a set of rules which had been drawn up by the Committee was approved. MR. H. STANLEY MAPLES was appointed Treasurer, and the REV. T. A. STODLEY, Head Master of the Grammar School, Librarian. Since then the Society itself has purchased a considerable number of books ; others have been given by the members ; donations have been made to the Museum ; several very interesting and instructive papers read ; and articles of antiquity exhibited.
